Book by Edinger, Edward F., Wesley, Deborah A.

Now that tearing down someone else's finely crafted work is so popular, there are very few thoughtful authors with the depth needed who will go back and re-work a psychological and theological framework such as Edinger has done. The need to bridge any gaps between Greek, Roman, and Judeo-Christian thought has been well addressed.

This work by a well known Jungian is slow going and relies too much on esoteric quotes from C.G. Jung. When he writes about the New Testament, Edinger is very informative though his style is tedious. The supplementary quotes from Jung are too long, over used and distractive. Jung's view on Christianity are hindered by his ambivalence about it and trying too hard to mythologize its message and mysteries. Edinger would have been better served using Jungian authors who are also believers.
