L. James Gibson completed a PhD in biology from Loma Linda University in 1984, when he joined the Geoscience Research Institute, becoming its director in 1994. His major interests include historical biology and the relationship of creation and science. He has written several articles and chapters for a number of journals and books, has participated in numerous seminars on faith and science on six continents and is editor of the journal Origins. Humberto M. Rasi completed a PhD in Hispanic literature and history at Stanford University, and a post doctoral fellowship at Johns Hopkins University. He served as professor and dean of graduate studies at Andrews University, and world director of the Education Department for the Seventh-day Adventist Church. He co-founded the Institute for Christian Teaching, and launched the journal College and University Dialogue. Although retired, he continues to lecture, publish, and coordinate projects in international higher education.

good, thanks

It covers a range of topics (authored by several scientists) surrounding creationism and does it in a very readable manner. The reader will receive a good understanding of the main issues and walk away knowing that creationism has technical viability but still has many unanswered questions thus leaving much yet to research.

Good book
